MONTHLY COMMENT

Following central bank announcements during the month of March, the rate reduction cycle remains on track for this year. On the United States side, one of the most reassuring aspects of all Fed's projections is the significantly downward trajectory of rates over the next three years. Three rate cuts are expected in 2024, and ten through 2026. The Federal Reserve has confirmed its position that current interest rates are likely to return to a more balanced level, barring any external disruption, and that the importance of restrictive monetary policy has declined. At the same time, it also revised upwards its economic growth outlook for 2024 to 2026, which encourages talk of a soft landing for the American economy. For its part, the ECB Governing Council also suggested that a first-rate cut could take place in June. From its point of view, the ECB expects inflation to reach its target of 2% in 2025, after having been 2.3% in 2024.

All these announcements enabled the markets to post a good performance in March: The Eurostoxx 50 rose by 4.33% and the S&P 500 by 3.18%.
